What is Swipe (SXP)?

The goal of the community-driven decentralized network Swipe or Solar Network is to provide a simple payment system in which businesses and individuals can issue debit cards secured by cryptocurrency. Swipe was developed to connect the payment infrastructure to cryptocurrency trading platforms.

Using the Delegated Proof of Stake (DPoS) consensus mechanism, they hope to foster genuine governance within the network with robust community participation and keep a powerful and flexible blockchain technology operational. As the protocol continues to adapt to new technologies, it stands out from other blockchain-based businesses.

The Swipe network provides its users with a safe environment in which they can transact and be paid with around 150 different cryptocurrencies across more than 70 million different locations. The SXP token, the protocol's native token, is a flexible coin that may be used for a wide variety of network-related purposes, including but not limited to governance and staking incentives, multichain transactions, on-chain and off-chain payments, and so on. The cryptocurrency is helpful for card issue fees, transaction fees, access to the Ethereum and Binance Smart Chain, and voting on the protocol for upgrades and leadership.

Swipe's unique API and lock functionality makes it easy to report a lost or stolen card and have it immediately disabled until the user can get a replacement. In 2020, Binance bought Solar Network and added functionality to allow for the conversion of NFTs, digital assets, and cryptocurrencies to fiat currency at an accurate and timely exchange rate.

Swipe (SXP) Price History

On July 13, 2020, SXP was listed on major markets, and trading got off to a roaring start. By August 10, 2020, demand for SXP coin from investors had driven up its price by 825 percent. Binance's July announcement that it had acquired Swipe's majority share and subsequent listing of the SXP token on its exchange sparked the rise.

Binance bought Swipe because it saw it as a way to bring together fiat currency and digital currency in everyday transactions. As a result of sellers entering the market, the price fell as some investors decided they had made enough money off of the gain.

Following its initial surge, the SXP token entered a downturn, making lower lows until it approached the vicinity of its ICO price of $0.58 in December 2020. There was a lot of buying support there, and the currency didn't have time to consolidate before another big price increase.

Starting in January 2021, SXP token prices rose steadily until the beginning of May 2021, when they surged to a new all-time high (ATH) of $5.88. A subsequent major drop caused the coin's value to plummet by 77%, to $1.33 at the end of May 2021. There was support for SXP there, and despite a brief upward movement, the price retested this level numerous times until the end of July 2021.

In August 2021, the SXP coin started making higher lows and kept doing so until the end of the month, giving early investors a 235% return off of July lows. Until December of 2021, the coin would continue to fall and establish new, lower lows.

Binance announced the acquisition of Swipe's outstanding shares the day before New Year's Eve, 2021, after SXP fluctuated during the month of December. Since the price increase was just around 60%, it had an impact on the market, but it wasn't as large as the first acquisition.

However, that upswing was only temporary, and the price has been falling ever since, with new lows being made as recently as mid-May 2022. The price of SXP dropped below critical support and hit a new low (ATL) of $0.29. The coin ricocheted back up from that point to try to break through the new barrier, but it was unsuccessful. SXP has dropped to $0.30 once more, suggesting that it may be creating a double bottom.

Will SXP Hit $100?

SXP would need a 295-fold increase to $100. Swipe would be $54 billion more valuable at $100 per share. In addition, it would take Swipe 25 years to reach $100 if its value increased by 25% annually.

Therefore, there looks to be a good argument for Swipe to hit $100, if the SXP coin price projection is accurate. A simpler solution would be to burn between 25% and 50% of the tokens.
